

Partner re-elected as National Councillor of the Institute of Arbitrators & Mediators Australia

4 June 2008

Andrew Robertson, Partner with national law firm Piper Alderman, has been re-elected as National Councillor of The Institute of Arbitrators & Mediators Australia (IAMA).

IAMA is Australia's largest, independent and most experienced arbitration and mediation service. It is Australia-wide, with members represented in all States and Territories.

In addition to practising as part of Piper Alderman's national dispute resolution team, Andrew is also a qualified accountant (CPA), graded arbitrator and accredited mediator. He has 13 years experience in legal practice, involving a substantial number of successful complex litigious matters in the State and Federal Courts and he has advised clients across a wide range of industries and professions.

As National Councillor Andrew has already achieved significant results, including negotiating a Memoranda of Co-operation with ADR bodies in the Philippines and China.

Andrew is thrilled to have been re-elected and has high aspirations for the role over the next two years.

"I want to build on the work of developing the profile of IAMA and all forms of alternative dispute resolution. I want to develop IAMA's image as a professional organisation, providing reliable dispute revolvers by focusing on the promotion of effective rules and providing specialised training."
